Guest column by UNT President Gretchen Bataille: In 1890, after Joshua C. Chilton opened what was then a private normal college, the Pilot Point Post-Mirror reported that "Denton is destined to be the educational center of North Texas." Indeed, today the University of North Texas has fulfilled that destiny. From its beginning above a hardware store on the corner of Oak and Elm streets, the student-centered public research university that today is UNT has been tightly intertwined with the city of Denton. ... As the community surrounding our campus grows and changes, the need to balance the past and the future can become a cause for friction. The ongoing conversation about the future of Fry Street demonstrates the power of memory as well as the impetus for change. Both are important to a university that values the past while it endeavors to prepare students for the future. ... Redevelopment of the Fry Street area is vital to the well-being of our campus community. In the wonderful blending of Denton and UNT, Fry Street is as much a part of our campus as the classroom buildings. ... We too are making history, and I encourage city leaders, neighbors, and United Equities to set aside local politics and work together to make Fry Street Village a success. The alternative, a big patch of dirt, doesn't look nearly as promising.

See these two articles regarding stolen artwork and the attempts to recover it. The first story features Dr. Nada Shabout, an assistant professor of art history in the UNT College of Visual Arts and Design, who visited Iraq in 2003 only to discover the Iraqi Museum of Modern Art looted and burned. She has dedicated her life to tracking down the stolen art. In the second story, Robert Edsel recounts the rescue of Europe's greatest paintings, monuments and other cultural treasures from the Nazis' unprecedented and systematic looting and destruction.
